Such a study of tattoos can tell us much about the semiotic nature of culture, taboo and associated understandings of risk, the risk of permanence. For a long time tattoos were 'made' taboo (also read Mary Douglas). The making of taboos and the study of rituals and gesture should be of much interest to people in the risk industry that thrives on the making of salvation rituals against taboos.

Exploring the role of motherhood and its impact on individual identity, this stunning series of images questions what it means to transition from the role as an individual to that of a mother. Focusing on tattooed mothers as a visual metaphor for individuality versus societal perceptions, the series challenges the - often 'fluffy' - mainstream stereotypes of what motherhood looks like. Starkly juxtaposing images of the individual self expression of tattoos against the environmental portrait of how society sees them in their role as a mother to reveal the underlying identities and individual personalities accompanied by each subject's personal story of motherhood.
