This rule of thumb states that the MAX heating capacity required for your comfort cooling application is 1.7 x the cooling load. For example, if the cooling required is 30 tons (360,000 btus), then the MAX heating capacity required would be 612,000 btus (1.7 x 360,000).

Rule of Thumb HVAC Sizing. Frequently designers and contractors "guestimate" the size of HVAC units by figuring 1 Ton (12,000 Btuh) of air conditioning will cover 400 square feet (Sq-Ft) of building area. This ratio is vastly overused, and often leads to undersized HVAC units in our climate zone (the Sacramento Valley).

Rule of Thumb Sizing

The rule is that the air conditioner has to be no larger than 115% of the Manual J cooling load. It could be more than that if that number falls between sizes, but you get the idea. ENERGY STAR Version 2 doesn't require much in the way of checking Manual J reports, but I go above and beyond when I look at them.
