The Man Who Invented The 8-Hour Workday Had An Even More Radical Idea For Money. Introduced in 1832, the radical idea was called the National Equitable Labour Exchange - a system of currency built on the idea that labour is the source of all wealth, and that goods should be bought and sold based on the time it took labourers to produce it. While the Exchange lasted only a few years, the idealistic project helped to lay the groundwork for some of Owen's more successful later reforms, such ...
